Global Learning in the Digital Age

Originally released in 2001, the ISTE National Educational Technology Standards for Administrators (NETS•A) followed on the success of the NETS for Students (NETS•S) and NETS for Teachers (NETS•T), defining the responsibilities of district and school leaders in the effective use of technology in education. Based on a national consensus among educational stakeholders of what best indicated effective school leadership for comprehensive and appropriate use of technology in schools at that time, the original standards directed public attention to the crucial role played by school administrators in bringing about successful implementation of technology in our schools.

Leading the Transformation of Learning Environments

What does a changed system for learning look like? The following chart lists characteristics representing traditional approaches to learning and corresponding strategies associated with new learning environments.

Traditional Environments	Emerging Learning Landscape
Teacher-directed, memory-focused instruction	Student-centered, performance-focused learning
Linear, prescriptive path progression	Flexible progression with multiple options
Controlled media, single-view instruction	Multitouch, multimedial simulation
Knowledge from direct, authoritative sources	Learner-constructed knowledge from multiple information sources and experiences
Isolated work on inerted content	Collaborative work on authentic, real-world problem
Mastery of fixed content and specified processes	Student engagement in definition, design, and management of projects
Rhetoric, formal thinking for competence	Creative thinking for innovation and original solutions
In-school expertise, content, and activities	Global expertise, information, and learning experiences
Stand-alone communication and information tools	Converging information and communication systems
Traditional literacy and communication skills	Digital fluency and communication skills
Primary focus on school and local community	Expanded focus including digital global citizenship

Definitions

ICT tools for information and communication technology. The application used throughout much of the world at the time of the word technology when referring to skills or standards for technology use.

Educational technology refers to the application of technology for learning.

In the U.S., administrator refers to the superintendent of a school district—commonly known in other countries as chief education officer—or to the principal of a school building—commonly known in other countries as head teacher, headmaster, or headmistress.

In the U.S., district program director can denote a staff such as curriculum, special programs, communication, assessment, financial, and facility directors. District-level technology directors with titles such as chief technology officer or technology coordinator should refer to the ISTE standards delineated through the National Council for Accreditation of Teacher Education (NCATE). The role of district technology coordinator is addressed in the ISTE/NCAATE Technology Leadership Standards, and the role of school-based leader for technology is addressed in the ISTE/NCAATE Technology for Student Standards.

Throughout a school system requires accepting new challenges and leaders face challenges that have expanded from local issues in nature from the worldwide fiscal crisis of 2008–09 to the changes on the day-to-day business of education, it's no longer just about leadership. More than ever before, the success of technology in supporting, implementing, and sustaining systemic reform depends seriously to leadership for effective use of technology to continue to place new demands on educators and students. It is the role of school leaders to follow as they transition schools into digital learning environments. Specifically, these standards emphasize educational leadership with in the following categories:

ISTE acknowledges two critical understandings. First, the standards raised the bar for school administrators. For administrators to lead global learning, they must become comfortable collaborating as members of the world. And second, in today's digital learning culture, it is the role of school leaders to move forward as members of dynamic learning communities. The standards in for technology infusion and ensures development of his or her own technology skills and those of others. These are the hallmarks of the new school leader.

standards for students, teachers, and administrators to influence the direction of their districts, locally and globally.

Together, the NETS•S, NETS•T, and NETS•A provide a vision for how to transform schools into digital-age places of learning. They are meant to be demanding and transformative. At this point in time, technology plans need to be designed and used. However, in the future, as the refreshed NETS and technology become infused into instruction, ISTE and the education community will look to update the NETS again, reflecting the changes in technology, learning, and instruction.

Education Must Change

Expectations are changing...

"Today's kids think differently than we do. The speed of technological advances and the frantic pace of media delivery have changed what students expect from teachers and what they learn. To effectively reach these young people, teachers need technological tools to meet kids where they are and to engage them in school activities."

Kimberly Vidoni, PhD
Educational Technology Coordinator
Nevada Department of Education

Teaching is changing...

"We can achieve so much more if we are actively engaged in professional learning communities. Teachers are empowered to collaborate with colleagues across the hall or halfway around the world as they explore strategies for advancing student learning and inspiring creativity and innovation—one student at a time."

Educators Must Lead

As technologies dramatically increase their penetration into our society, teachers must develop the skills and behaviors of digital-age professionals. Competence with technology should be part of the transformation to 21st-century teaching and learning, however, modeling effective ICT skills and lifelong learning strategies. Students need to be equipped with the basics in authentic, integrated ways that manifest in student experience solving projects, and creatively extending their abilities. It is these kinds of experiences that will help students meet the National Educational Technology Standards for Students (NETS•S) and prepare them as future leaders, and contributing global citizens.

For that reason, the ISTE National Educational Technology Standards for Teachers (NETS•T) are aligned with the NETS•S.
